Last month, acclaimed director Sean Baker rocked the Sundance Film Festival with the critically acclaimed Nobody Walks. But it was Baker's directorial debut, The Florida Project, that really lit up the ski-doo. The film, about a Florida nursing home, became the closing night film at Sundance and won the World Cinema Dramatic Audience Award and was named runner-up for the Sundance Filmmaker Labs Vision Award. "It's a real detective story," Baker tells EW of his favorite scene in the movie. "We used a night shot to show the life of the house at night, so when you first see it, it just really looks like all the lights are still on. As you get to know the characters, you see that these people are feeding off one another." Baker also chats about the film's complicated post-production process, what he learned from working with teenage actors, how SXSW compares to Sundance, and why the crew decided to break character during the final climax. ENTERTAINMENT WEEKLY: The Florida Project revolves around a motley crew of young adults who spend their days together at a psychiatric center in the Florida Keys. How did you choose the people to fill the roles? SEAN BAKER: We found them in Miami. We went to the local juvenile detention center, which is right up the road from where we shot. We met with the kids and we were able to get our money through the government. We were given basic training on how to work with the kids. We really cared about the kids and we're just stunned by them. They're so amazing and the director [Pedro] Almendros and I had a connection with them immediately. How is the psychology of the kids a big part of the movie? We tried to have a realistic experience and capture the situations that the kids are in. b7e8fdf5c8
